

CONTENTS

KAZUHIKO TOGO, a visiting researcher at Princeton University and former Japanese ambassador to the Netherlands, calls for a complete reimagining of the Yasukuni Shrine and the Japanese attitudes that it symbolizes. PAGE 5

TSUNEO WATANABE, a senior fellow at Mitsui Global Strategic Studies Institute, and TAKAHIDE KIUCHI, senior economist with Nomura Securities, survey the Japanese political and economic landscape of the post-Koizumi future. PAGE 16

GORDON G. CHANG, author of The Coming Collapse of China, argues that there are more reasons than ever for the Chinese regime to fall before the decade ends. PAGE 25

JOHN S. PARK, project leader of the North Korea Analysis Group at the Kennedy School of Government, argues that South Korea can best prop up North Korea's economy by bringing in a third player—China. PAGE 29

LEILA FERNANDEZ-STEMBRIDGE, professor of Chinese economy at the Universidad Autonoma de Madrid, and JEAN-FRANCOIS HUCHET, professor of economics at the University of Rennes, explore what remains to be done in reforming China's state-owned enterprises. PAGE 32

MUKUL G. ASHER, professor of economics at the National University of Singapore, warns that India's social security system, out of step with the country's modern workforce, is in dire need of reform. PAGE 37

ALASTAIR MCINDOE, a free-lance writer based in Manila, analyzes the ideals and machinations that are shaping the Philippines' movement for constitutional change. PAGE 41

MANUEL F. MONTES and SWARNIM WAGLE, of the United Nations Development Programme in Colombo, explain how Asia-Pacific countries could strike smarter trade deals. PAGE 45

DAVID BANDURSKI, a researcher at the University of Hong Kong's China Media Project, claims that China's commercialization without liberalization has spun Chinese media into a dangerous vortex. PAGE 49

BRIAN J.M. QUINN, a teaching fellow on corporate governance at Stanford University Law School, suggests that corruption as a way of life in Vietnam may be coming to a close. PAGE 52

JAUNT THROUGH ASIA: For our new feature section, William MacNamara sits in on the finals of China's intercollegiate Shakespeare competition. PAGE 74

REVIEWS:

EMILY PARKER on the fraught politics of Japan's foreign aid to China. PAGE 55 • DAVID PLOTT on an analysis of the 21st century's first pandemic scare, SARS. PAGE 57 • SADANAND DHUME on a slim new history of Indonesia. PAGE 58 • JEFF KINGSTON on a study of Japan's bad, bad attitudes toward juvenile "misbehavior" in the 20th century. PAGE 60 • M.D. NALAPAT on an account of how Nepal's Maoist guerilla movement got out of hand. PAGE 62 • MICHAEL BYRNES on an essay collection exploring the possibilities of Chinese power in Asia. PAGE 65 • CLYDE PRESTOWITZ on a new critique of Japan's lost decade. PAGE 67 • ASHOK K. MEHTA on an examination of India's and Pakistan's behavior during the crises they create for each other. PAGE 69 • FROM THE ARCHIVES In 1995, Sonia Gandhi was an unproven but still formidable figure in Indian politics. PAGE 72