

CONTENTS

25 अ.अ. 2548

LYNNE O'DONNELL, an Australian journalist based in London, found that relief workers in Aceh were so contemptuous of the U.S. military they refused to acknowledge its strengths in responding to the tsunami disaster. PAGE 6

ANNE STEVENSON-YANG AND KEN DEWOSKIN, managing director of the U.S. Information Technology Office in Beijing and a former China-based partner at PricewaterhouseCoopers respectively, predict that enforcement's failure to contain China's rampant copying of technology and products spells the end of the current intellectual property paradigm. PAGE 9

ROBYN MEREDITH, a correspondent for Forbes magazine based in Hong Kong, chronicles the emergence of a new wave of offshoring bound for Asia. PAGE 19

PASUK PHONGPAICHT AND CHRIS BAKER, long-time observers of Thai politics, parse Thaksin Shinawatra's plans to use his landslide victory in February's parliamentary elections to consolidate his personal power. PAGE 25

NICHOLAS EBERSTADT, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, suggests Pyongyang could be induced to adopt a viable alternative governing model: Stalinism. PAGE 30

BRAHMA CHELLANEY, a professor of strategic studies at the Center for Policy Research in New Delhi, urges India to adopt a policy of constructive engagement toward Nepal. PAGE 35

HUGO RESTALL, editor of the REVIEW, remembers the hapless Tung Chee Hwa as a pivotal figure in Hong Kong's political evolution, and possibly in Beijing's eventual acceptance of the territory's democratic aspirations. PAGE 39

STEVE TSANG, a fellow at St Antony's College, Oxford, lays out the reasons why Europe should retain an arms embargo on China. PAGE 43

BARUN MITRA, director of the Liberty Institute in New Delhi, condemns the Kyoto Protocol as a potential trap that will keep the world's developing nations mired in poverty. PAGE 47

DINGLI SHEN, a professor of international studies at Fudan University, believes that the world will accept North Korea's nuclear status and the U.S. must compromise if it is to slow Pyongyang's weapons development. PAGE 51

MARK VALENCIA, a maritime security analyst in Honolulu, warns that the Proliferation Security Initiative may cost the U.S. support in Asia while proving ineffective. PAGE 55

IN TRANSLATION: Hsu Yong-min, a researcher at Taiwan's Academia Sinica, assesses the impact of China's antiseccession law. PAGE 58

REVIEWS:

MELANA VICKERS on the newest contribution to the 'rising China' genre. PAGE 60 • HENNY SENDER on an attempt to chart Japan's social transformations. PAGE 62 • MARGARET PEARSON on an analysis of how China governs markets. PAGE 64 • COLUM MURPHY on a Carlos Ghosn tell-all. PAGE 66 • SHAOMIN LI on two studies of China's corruption. PAGE 68 • BRAD GLOSSERMAN on essays about dealing with North Korea. PAGE 72 • STEPHEN MORRIS on a craven justification of the Hun Sen government's refusal to prosecute Khmer Rouge leaders. PAGE 74 • FROM THE ARCHIVES: In 1993, Ahn Byung-joon, a professor at Yonsei University, charged China with resolving the North Korean crisis. PAGE 78