Features

50 The Uncompromising Leader
Russell A. Eisenstat, Michael Beer, Nathaniel Foote, Tobias Fredberg, and Flemming Norrgren
Many CEOs focus single-mindedly on performance, which can alienate employees. Others go too far the other way: Concern for their people and culture can sap their firms' competitive vitality. Fortunately, you don't have to choose between profits and people.

60 The Competitive Imperative of Learning
Amy C. Edmondson
To compete in the knowledge economy, companies need to view execution not as an efficient way to get things done but as an effective way to learn from experience.

68 THE HBR INTERVIEW
Finding a Higher Gear
Anand G. Mahindra
Interviewed by Thomas A. Stewart and Anand P. Raman
The head of one of India's emerging giants discusses how he fosters a culture of customer-centric innovation, his personal change-management formula, and why he believes the value of the Mahindra & Mahindra group is more than the sum of its parts.

78 Employee Motivation: A Powerful New Model
Nitin Nohria, Boris Groysberg, and Linda-Eling Lee
Getting workers to do their best requires fulfilling their emotional drives -- four in particular that all people share. This model outlines how to use organizational levers toward that end and, thereby, make big gains in employee motivation.

88 Should You Invest in the Long Tail?
Anita Elberse
Are blockbusters losing their power now that online retailing can offer a little something for every taste? The answer may surprise you.
98 Investing in the IT That Makes a Competitive Difference
Andrew McAfee and Erik Brynjolfsson
Companies that use their enterprise IT systems to propagate innovative business processes quickly, widely, and accurately are winning customers and gaining a competitive edge. Rivals that also master the technology, however, can not only match those moves but leapfrog over them.

108 The Finance Function in a Global Corporation
Mihir A. Desai
Now that multinational companies have what amounts to their own internal capital markets, the finance function must graduate to a more strategically engaged level. A globally competent finance department is one that understands how to reconcile the firm’s financial, managerial, and institutional priorities across business units.

continued on page 6

Best of HBR

118 Putting the Service-Profit Chain to Work
James L. Heskett, Thomas O. Jones, Gary W. Loveman, W. Earl Sasser, Jr., and Leonard A. Schlesinger
Outstanding service organizations focus on customers and frontline workers. The service-profit chain puts hard values on soft measures, helping managers quantify their investments in people and then integrate those measures into a comprehensive service picture.

130 Choosing Strategies for Change
John P. Kotter and Leonard A. Schlesinger
In an increasingly dynamic environment, managers need to learn how to combat resistance to change. They can start by recognizing which of the four most common types of resistance they face and then choosing the right combination of techniques to overcome it.

140 Competing on Resources
David J. Collis and Cynthia A. Montgomery
A successful strategy links core competence and capabilities with market demands and competitors’ offers. Does yours? A set of pragmatic market tests can help you accumulate a competitively distinct stock of resources while keeping a sharp eye on industry forces.