Departments

12 COMPANY INDEX

14 FROM THE EDITOR

18 STRATEGIC HUMOR

20 FORETHOUGHT
Leaders and the vision paradox...After a promotion, start networking right away...
What winning CEOs do in their first year...
Where women are gaining influence in the boardroom...Glaxo’s very public CEO succession race...Lego’s CEO on leading from bad times through good times to new times...Why smart companies are helping to train employees for a second career in nonprofits...Don’t wait to start your own firm...Plus the best from HBR’s archives on leadership transitions.

91 HBR RESEARCH REPORT
What Can Coaches Do for You?
Diane Coutu and Carol Kauffman
Executive coaches are increasingly in demand. HBR’s survey of more than 100 coaches reveals why they’re hired, what they do, and how they measure success.

99 HBR AT LARGE
How GE Teaches Teams to Lead Change
Steven Prokesch
When a senior management team is trained as a group, rather than individually, its members can reach consensus on what challenges they face and how to overcome them. That accelerates the pace of change.

108 LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

114 EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

120 PANEL DISCUSSION
Is Experience Enough?
Don Moyer
Old mental models may block new insights.

41 DIFFERENT VOICE
Playing to the Back Row
A Conversation with Ringmaster Chuck Wagner
The ringmaster for Ringling Bros. talks about what it’s like when your workplace really is a circus. His job — perhaps like yours — is to keep people focused on the right things.
Features

46 Picking the Right Transition Strategy
Michael D. Watkins
If you’re moving into a new leadership role, chances are you’ll need a new approach. This tool will help you match your style to the situation.

54 The Quick Wins Paradox
Mark E. Van Buren and Todd Safferstone
Leaders in new roles may need a quick win to prove themselves, but focusing on individual success can produce toxic results. They should engage their team members in a collective achievement instead.

62 Women and the Vision Thing
Herminia Ibarra and Otilia Obodaru
Women outshine men in evaluations of leadership ability, receiving lower ratings in only one area: vision. That exception is a big one, however, and it casts a shadow over an otherwise bright picture for executive women.

72 How Not to Lose the Top Job
Marshall Goldsmith
Many potential CEO successors find themselves knocked out of contention at the last minute. A veteran executive coach explains how to recruit allies and win the contest.

82 The Last Act of a Great CEO
Thomas J. Friel and Robert S. Duboff
A lot of hard-earned knowledge can be lost to your organization when a CEO departs. Here’s how to ensure that it’s retained.

continued on page 6