Features

56 How GE Is Disrupting Itself
Jeffrey R. Immelt, Vijay Govindarajan, and Chris Trimble
In a bid to preempt the emerging giants, General Electric is innovating products for the developing world and then bringing them to its core markets.

68 HBR Roundtable
Managing Risk in the New World
Robert S. Kaplan, Anette Mikes, Robert Simons, Peter Tufano, and Michael Hofmann

76 HBR Tool
Mapping Your Fraud Risks
Toby J.F. Bishop and Frank E. Hydoski

78 The Six Mistakes Executives Make in Risk Management
Nassim N. Taleb, Daniel G. Goldstein, and Mark W. Spitznagel

82 How Vulnerable Is Your Business to Consumer Debt?
William Jarvis and Ian C. MacMillan

84 Making the Financial Markets Safe
A Conversation with Robert Merton

86 Should You Launch a Fighter Brand?
Mark Ritson
If your premium brand is losing share to cheap rivals, you can fight back by creating an inexpensive brand of your own. Just beware these common hazards.

96 The Five Traps of Performance Measurement
Andrew Likierman
Numbers alone can’t tell you how well your company is performing—especially when they result from simple, easy-to-game metrics. Some leading companies have chosen a more sophisticated approach.

102 Making Time Off Predictable—and Required
Leslie A. Perlow and Jessica L. Porter
People in professional services accept the 24/7 work culture without hesitation, believing it comes with the territory. But new research suggests that consultants and other professionals can meet the highest standards of service and still have planned, uninterrupted time off.

continued on page 10